題型 3

Owing to recession, American campgrounds and national parks have had difficulty remaining in operation. Budget cuts have meant reduced staff and too few employees to do basic maintenance.

Fortunately, volunteer work-campers are ready to save the day. They are retired senior citizens who are keen on traveling but on a tight budget. They arrive with their trailer homes or camping vehicles and are permitted to camp for free because the parks rely on them to remain open.

America's parks are currently being served by around 80,000 of these traveling helpers. Work-campers typically stay at one campground for a month or so and work 20 to 30 hours a week, leading nature walks, picking up trash, and helping at tourist centers. Then they head for another site.

Many work-campers say this is the best job they have ever had. "It attracts people-lovers," says Walter Searle, aged 64. "We enjoy helping folks, and we're proud to help keep the parks running."
